Part of Google Chrome's appeal lies in its minimal interface, free from stacks of toolbars and rows of icon shortcuts. At the same time, the right extension can improve your Web experience without ruining the browser's stripped-down style. Here we pick out our favourite 20 extensions for Chrome, listed in no particular order of preference. All of these extensions can be found on the Chrome Web Store -- bear in mind that you can sync Chrome extensions across multiple machines if you want to, via the Personal Stuff page of the Settings tab. Let us know about your own favourite extensions in the comments below.

1. Google Dictionary: The best extensions feel like built-in browser features, which is the case with Google Dictionary. Once the extension's installed, double-click on a word to see an instant pop-up definition (with a link for further information) -- find out exactly what "cornucopia" means without interrupting your browsing. Alternatively, you can also look up a word by clicking on the extension icon in the toolbar. If you're new to Buffer, it spreads out your tweets over a predetermined schedule, so your followers aren't overloaded. It's not suitable for time-sensitive tweets (complaining about the latest episode of Homeland perhaps), but it's perfect for queueing up links and such like. The Chrome extension works flawlessly, composing and buffering your tweet in a couple of mouse clicks.
3. Chrome to Phone: If you're using an Android phone or tablet, you can use the Chrome to Phone extension to quickly send links and other content to your mobile device, either via the right-click menu or the extension icon. You'll also need to install the Chrome to Phone app on your Android device, where you can choose whether to open up links automatically.
4. Google Calendar: Google has extensions for just about all of its multitude of products and services, but the Google Calendar one is worth a look -- not only does it provide an at-a-glance overview of your upcoming events, it can also recognise when a webpage contains an event (such as a Facebook page) and enables you to add the event to your calendar with a single click.
5. Evernote Web Clipper: Keeping bookmarks and starred tweets is all well and good, but Evernote lets you create a fully fledged interactive scrapbook of all the interesting material you find on the Web. This is one of the official extensions, which enables you to quickly add content to your Evernote account ready for sorting out later. You'll need to register an account (opens in new tab) at first.
6. Awesome Screenshot: Get past the over-the-top name and Awesome Screenshot is a very useful screenshot tool that manages to be both packed with features and easy to use. It's possible to add annotations, capture entire webpages (even when they are only partially visible), share pictures quickly via the internet, and more. Images can be saved locally, uploaded or copied to the clipboard as required.
7. TinEye Reverse Image Search: If you're looking for a bigger version of a certain image or want to find out where a picture originated from, then TinEye can help -- this reverse image search takes your source picture and looks for other matching instances of it on the Web. There's no icon added to the Chrome interface, just an extra option on the right-click context menu.
8. Click&Clean: Take more control over what your PC and your browser knows about you with Click&Clean -- the extension can help you erase your browsing history, edit your privacy settings, remove tabs based by domain, view cached video files, and more. It also links to some of Chrome's less well-known areas, such as the built-in Task Manager.
9. TooManyTabs: For Chrome Tabbed browsing means we're all surfing the Web faster and more efficiently than ever before, but if you often find yourself lost in a forest of open tabs, use TooManyTabs to better manage them. Get an overview of all open tabs, 'suspend' individual tabs for later viewing, search through all of your tabs at once, and more.
10. Download Master: If you need to download all of the files from a particular page, be they pictures or Zip files, Download Master can lend a hand. Click the extension icon to see a list of all available links, which you can then filter based on file type or keyword. The downloads themselves are handled by Chrome's built-in download manager.
11. Readability: Danish adverts, sidebar videos and other on-screen junk with Readability -- click the extension icon to see a clean, clear version of the article you're currently viewing. The extension works without a Readability account, though if you sign up for one you can also save articles for later reading. The extension can send articles to your Kindle device too.
12. Rapportive: Gmail is getting better at adding contact info alongside emails, but Rapportive is still streets ahead. Pull in data from Twitter, LinkedIn and other social networks to make the right-hand contact pane much more useful. The extension works seamlessly in the background, requires little in the way of configuration and soon feels like a native part of Gmail.
13. Last.fm scrobble: Last.fm's various desktop clients and integrated tools do a decent job of tracking your listening history, but what about the tunes you're hearing on the wilds of the Web? If you want to log these tracks too, install the Last.fm scrobble extension, which can pick up songs on YouTube, MySpace, Deezer and many other streaming websites.
14. Send to Kindle: If you happen to have joined the eReading revolution, then the Send to Kindle extension will definitely be of interest -- transfer webpages and articles to your portable device with most of the unwanted extras stripped out along the way. The extension has been tweaked to work well with a wide range of sites, including Wikipedia, Quora, Google Reader, MetaFilter and others. Does a webpage exist if it hasn't been shared on a social media network? If you're eager to share your latest online find with as many of your contacts as possible, AddThis makes it easy. It's tightly integrated with the big two (Facebook and Twitter) and supports many more services besides -- it can even work with Gmail and Instapaper.
16. Radioplayer: Based around content from Radioplayer, the official UK hub for over 300 online stations, Radioplayer pops up in a new window and lets you listen to the football commentary or enjoy the biggest hits of the 80s while you browse. Additional content underneath the playback bar, from information about the current show to further reading on the Web, varies from station to station.
17. Lookup Companion: Opening a new tab for Wikipedia-ing purposes is old hat -- use this streamlined extension instead and avoid having to leave the page you're on. Recent lookups are saved for future reference, and you can browse forwards and backwards in the extension window, which displays the mobile version of Wikipedia pages to make them as compact as possible. Chrome has plenty of nifty security features built in, but Dr Web Anti-Virus Link Checker adds another useful one without slowing down the program or your browsing. Once installed, the extension lets you scan links before you visit them, just in case your group of friends and family has a tendency to pass on a lot of virus-filled URLs.
19. Extensions Manager: Finally, an extension to help you better manage your extensions, as well as the themes and apps you've installed within Google Chrome's walls. Extensions Manager filters through outdated or disabled extensions and toggles their status with a single click, and access the options page for any installed extension. Google would do well to incorporate the ideas here into Chrome itself.
20. timeStats beta: Want to know where you've spent all your time on the Web? Are you absolutely sure? timeStats beta sits quietly in the toolbar logging everything that you do and then brings up a sleek-looking pie chart visualising just how much time you've spent on Twitter. Follow the Additional link to see an even more detailed breakdown of the places you've been. Chrome browser extensions are beautiful things. They can translate pages, help you manage your passwords and even get rid of unpleasant words. However, they're also prime vectors for all kinds of unpleasant malicious code. (Image credit: Jeramey Lende/Shutterstock) Usually, it's easy enough to sort out genuine Chrome extensions from their shady brethren, but what happens when good plugins go bad? At least eight Chrome extension developers have fallen prey to phishing schemes, had their Chrome developer accounts hijacked and their extensions altered. Their once-legitimate Chrome extensions now threaten millions of people, and it's likely more Chrome extension hijacks will come to light. The French security researcher known only as "Kabeine" discovered six new compromised extensions, adding to two more discovered earlier this month, and shared his findings on the Proofpoint website Monday (Aug. 14). The six otherwise-helpful Chrome extensions are currently spamming users with malicious popups and redirected advertisements, and it's likely that all eight developers fell for the same phishing scheme. MORE: Best Antivirus Software and Apps

First things first: If you have one of the corrupted extensions, you should uninstall or disable it right away. (However, you should also bookmark the developer's homepage, blog or Twitter account so that you know when it's safe to reinstall.) It doesn't matter if you're using Windows, macOS or Linux, as Chrome extensions are generally platform-independent. The version numbers for four of the compromised extensions are as follows: Chrometana 1.1.3, Infinity New Tab 3.12.3, Web Paint 1.2.1, Social Fixer 20.1.1. Two more extensions appear to have been compromised at the end of June, but the exact version numbers of the corrupted code are unverified: TouchVPN [current version 1.5.12, last updated June 25], Betternet VPN [current 4.4.5, last updated July 6]. Bleeping Computer estimates that almost 5 million people may be at risk from these extensions. Two additional apps, Copyfish and Web Developer, fell prey to the exact same method of hijacking earlier this month. However, those two apps have since been updated, and should be safe to use once again. The corrupted Chrome extensions are not dangerous in and of themselves, but use them long enough, and they can almost certainly compromise your computer. Rather than infecting systems themselves, the extensions redirect users to malicious websites that can do it for them. The compromised extensions spam users with popups, which exhort them to click on harmful sites. Furthermore, they replace legitimate advertisements with ones that have much more unscrupulous destinations. As for how the extensions became corrupted in the first place, it's a surprisingly simple story: The developers got phished. The men and women behind the Chrome extensions received extremely convincing emails from a Google lookalike, explaining that they had to log into their Google developer accounts immediately or risk losing valuable assets. The link and email address both looked convincing, and the message did not contain any spelling or grammatical errors. Once the developers "logged in," the attackers changed the code of the developers' extensions and pushed out updates. The lesson here is not "don't use Google Chrome Extensions," since they're generally helpful, reliable bits of software. Instead, perhaps, users may want to follow their favorite extension developers on Twitter to be notified of potential security breaches like this one ASAP. Keeping extensions up to date (which Chrome does automatically by default) and having a reliable antivirus program installed never hurt, either.
