I thought I'd share my thoughts on the News of the World phone hacking scandal. Privacy and public interest issues aside, I think this shows how vulnerable our modern communication systems can be and how easily information can be stolen without simple security measures (voicemail passwords in this case). . Not surprisingly, security is high on the list of concerns for companies looking to implement IP-based unified communications solutions. Think about it. We're not just talking about a few voicemails. We are talking about a huge amount of recorded messages, as well as e-mails, faxes, chat logs and all kinds of other materials from hundreds of users stored in one place and available not only on the local network, but probably at least, from anywhere on the Internet. Well, no one in their right mind would consider implementing a unified communications solution without some kind of security system to protect it. But we read about new vulnerabilities being discovered every day, and who knows what might be lurking in the bowels of that new VoIP or collaboration server, waiting to be exploited. Also, as the NoTW (News of The World) scandal shows, it doesn't matter what security measures are available, if users don't know how to implement them, or even don't know how to implement them, backdoors are connected. be found. The benefits of a well-implemented Unified Communications solution are enormous, but only when security considerations are taken into account. This means informing users and support personnel about potential hazards and how to prevent them. This article was written by Alan Stevens with support from Avaya.
