WARNING: Please understand that I am a serial fan of the Rash Road series. This is a good and negative thing. It's good, because you can be sure that I played hell out of the game. It's bad because I have a soft spot in my heart for these games, so I tend to be more forgiven how much others can be. With this in mind, think of road eruption 64 as Charlie Brown's Christmas tree. It could be ugly and welcoming but once passed this fact, the tree is A beautiful tree that only needed a little love. This is the first incarnation of the series on the N64 and instead of the original creators of the series, the electronic arts have decided to dismiss the name and idea of THQ. Both companies actually worked together with the project in an attempt to keep the roots of the games at heart. The group concept has been reported by the Rash Rash 3D version, only reduced back. Fight your way from 200 miles of tracks to determine if you are the last raSher outside. Gameplay Here is the two-minute tour where it's all. It is a game of motorcycle racing unlike any other game of runs out. This pilot is full. When I say complete contact, I don't even mean you can arm in other runners. I mean you have tons of weapons you can use if a racer approaches too much. A quick slap at the head with a pop-up club usually removes them. And oh, yes, since it's a race, the object is to get to the finish line in one piece. If you make it a piece, the finish in the first three positions qualifies you on that track and allows you to move forward and add some money to your bank account, used to buy new bicycles. Which practically summarizes it. And, in my opinion, this best series of games ever made. So what makes road eruption 64 different from one of the other eruption titles in the past? This is an easy question. The answer is that the combat is now the main focal point with racing almost as a side note. In past games, you wouldn't have had in many combat situations and would normally be the instigator. If a computer controlled opponent attacked you, it was rare that they would remain and beat. He usually would have made you an arrival and headed and head. No more. Now computer opponents gave you and they are wrong until you fall from the bike. They are simply decidedly vicious. There were moments I just wanted to get to the finish line, so I did all my power to avoid fighting, but they were relentless and simply won't leave me alone. He was aggravating during the race, but looking back, it was also nice enough. Another difference in this game is never too far too far, I'm too far away. Basically they forced all the runners together in a large group, which was why there was so much fight. Actually I thought that this was a little lame because the game is still a racing game but pulled out all the consequences to crash soon. I knew that if I crashed, it would have been a very short time before returning to the middle of the pack. This was also the same with the first place. I've never been quite far away in driving that if I had to collapse, I would have kept my advantage. The anomalous arrest was an instant trip to the back of the package, but since it was so easy to recover, the aspect of the game races is almost lost. One thing that led forward to the last PSX game was the concept of bands. The PSX version had four different bands, which were determined by the type of bike you were riding. The theory was that other members in that band will protect you or at least they didn't beat you so much. It was a great theory, but I never really noticed a difference in treatment among other pilots. Well, this problem was addressed in the N64 version. First of all, there are two bands or you can choose to be independent. You have to pay the quotas to belong to a band but is well spent money. I started playing the first three levels as independent and then yes to a band and was incredible at least I attacked me. See, your band members really left you alone and protect you. It was nice to see this actually working as advertised. Another ordered thing that was added for this game is that after each race, you will see the statistics for different actions that were performed during the race. For example, counts the number of accidents you caused, the officers have attacked, etc. More Mayhem you make you cause, the better your bonus you will receive. I thought it was really nice. My only complaint with it was that he didn't count To run on pedestrians. Come on, if you're going to put them out as targets, let me earn money for performing them. Also, I thought the bonuses were a bit small (mediated less than $ 50). If I could earn more money, I would do I would do More inclined state to start more fights. One last thing that is worth remembering is that while the controls were tight when it was standard maneuvers, there were moments that they didn't feel right. On the sharp corners, I was constantly turning the back of my bike around. It is really difficult to explain the feeling that I got, but it's not right. On the gradual corners everything works great. This game also offers a serious multiplayer action for those who love that kind of game. Multiplayer modes include Thrash, which is a race against human opponents with up to four players; Laps that allow you to play in special multiplayer arenas for a specified number of laps; Deathmatch, which prizes indicates the players for completing the laps and brings points to crash a player; Tags, who gives points to crash the person who is "it"; And my favorite, Ped Hunt, who gives the players points to run on pedestrians. You must like it. Graphics Remember at the top of this review, I said to think about this game like Charlie Brown's Christmas tree? For those of you who have never seen Charlie Brown Christmas Special Special (there is someone in the world that hasn't seen it at least 40 times?), Charlie Brown is responsible for the collection of a tree and chooses the ugly, Most family tree. Everyone gets angry with the old Chuck and says he is the worst tree ever. After a while, people begin to appreciate the tree for what he has to offer, not so much what they looked like. So what am I doing with that? This game will never win any premium for graphics. It has terrible mist problems, draw problems, and it's very simple. But like the tree, if you look over these physical deficiencies and accept it for what it is (a game focused on funny gameplay), you will be better: The game uses Ram Pak, but you would never know. Bottom Line Being the long date of the road that I am, I left this satisfied game. It is not the best version ever of the game, but offers some new twists and follows the old formula again. Look, the graphics sucks but don't let yourself be discouraged. In reality, if the graphics annoys you, call Nintendo and complain with them with their hardware because this is the problem. All in all, if you are a rash fan, take a look. Otherwise, give him a rental and see if he fits your style of play. style.
