There is an easy to apply test when you decide if you should use Â€Â€ ~ Â€ “Ã, â, ß” Â€ or Â€Â€ ~. Â€ â â â â â Â€ Â€ Â€ Â€ Â€ Â€ Â€ Â€ Â€ in a sentence. My friends and I look at these two sentences: my father is taking me and my friends at dinner. My father is taking my friends and I at dinner. In this case, the first sentence is correct. The test is to shorten the phrases: my father is bringing me to dinner. My father is bringing out to dinner. Now you can easily see that the first version is correct. You wouldn't want to say: my father is bringing out to dinner. Therefore, you wouldn't want to say: my father is taking my friends and I at dinner. The correct version is: my father is taking me and my friends at dinner. My friends and I a similar test can be applied with the following two sentences: my friends and I are going to dinner. My friends and I are coming out for dinner. Shorten the sentences: I'm going to dinner. I'm leaving for dinner. You can immediately see that the first version is correct: I'm going to dinner. Therefore, the following is correct: my friends and I are coming out for dinner. However, remember that when you talk or write in a casual / informal style, it's not a suspended offense to break these rules! Further clarification: WordWatchÂ€ Towers Butler has just rushed (ie walking a little faster than standing) to let me know that there is a lot of discussion on InterWebs that the person who writes / talk about Always place itself or itself the sentence. Some people are stating that the following phrase is Â€Â€ ~ Â€ “WrongÂ€Â€ ~ Â€” Â€ because the writer / diffuser is mentioned first: Â€ my father is taking me and my friends at dinner. Â€ Well, to be clear, it's not “it Â€Â€ ~ ~ ~ Â€Â€” is correct, as it is the following: Â€, my father is taking my friends and me to dinner. Similarly , both the following are correct: Â€, I and my friends are coming out for dinner. Â€, my friends and I are coming out for dinner. In summary, it is possible to place Â€Â€ ~ ~ ~ Â€, ~ ~ ~ Â€, Â€, Â€, Â€, Â€, Â€ “The first or second place; the choice is all yours. Furthermore, see the discussion on this in the discussion of the comments below. Other writing guides are looking for a guide easy to understand for Punctuation, grammar and writing well?
